a private guided tour. It was almost unbelievable that so many fine objects of art could have been collected together in a single castle. The family lives in one wing, and this is comfortable and delightfully furnished. The other guests were Greek, French, and English. We really had a splendid day. The place belongs to trustees, with whom the Duke has made some arrangement whereby they will allow him to continue his activities for a period of years in the hope of paying off the debts, chiefly death duties, of the estate. Some of his fellow peers take a dim view of the way in which he has advertised and commercialized the property. Perhaps there is an element of jealousy in this, for to judge by appearances, he is making a striking success of the enterprise.

June 18, 1962 - Monday

Beautiful weather again. Henry Pleasants stopped in to see me this morning, as did Fred Miller, who was our Air Attache in Bonn, but is now stationed in Washington. Henry and Ginny are coming this afternoon to stay with us for a few days. During my absence in America, the Philip de Rothschilds spent most of last week in the house. Kay Halle has left, after a fortnight's sojourn.

Dr. Willard Cochrane, Director of Agricultural Economics, with four of his staff, came to see me this morning. They have been touring Europe, investigating the operations of the Common Market. Lunched at the office. I received a delegation of Veterans Administration officials this afternoon.

Stefan Zamoyski called me last night, and I arranged with him to see his wife, himself, and Prince Radziwill, Stash's father, at home this evening. The old Prince has been on a visit here, but is returning shortly to Poland.

E and I dined tonight at Grocers Hall. General Sir James Marshall-Cornwall, a war-time friend and associate, had particularly asked that we be present. The Grocers Hall is a wonderful building for a big party. There were several hundred
